Aerojet Man New CIA Chief

Adm. William F. Raborn, an Aerojet General Corp. vice president and a frequent visitor to the Sacramento Aerojet plant, has been named director of the Central Intelligence Agency by President Johnson.

Adm. Raborn, visited Sacramento first as the developer of the Polaris missile, and then as vice president for project management of Aerojet. The retired naval officer, 60, will replace retiring John A. McCone, as CIA director.

Johnson announced the appointment to newsmen, with Raborn present, after signing into law the $1.3 billion aid to education bill at the President's old country school house near his Texas ranch.

The chief executive at the same time said he was appointing Richard Helm, now CIA deputy director for plans, as deputy director of the agency and thus No. 2 man to Raborn.

Helm, 52, also was present when Johnson made the announcement.

Helm retired from the Navy as a vice-admiral a year and a half ago. He was then director of research on the staff of the chief of naval operations.

Johnson said he did not know when the appointments would take effect or when he would send the Raborn nomination to the Senate for confirmation.
